The paraventricular nucleus (PVN) of the hypothalamus contains noradrenergic neurons projecting to the posterior hypothalamus and other brain regions. These neurons are regulated by the osmotic pressure of the environment. During cold exposure the anterior pituitary hormones are mainly secreted by cells in the pars intermedia (PI) of the posterior pituitary gland. This study examines the possibility that activity of the PVN noradrenergic neurons, and that of hypothalamic anterior pituitary hormones are also regulated by the osmotic pressure of the environment. By measuring the extracellular concentrations of adenosine and noradrenaline in the PVN and PI of conscious, restrained rats, it was found that raising or lowering the environmental osmotic pressure raises or lowers the extracellular levels of adenosine or noradrenaline in these regions, respectively. Moreover, the onset of cold exposure leads to an increase in the extracellular concentration of adenosine and a fall in noradrenaline in the PVN.

Other experiments indicate that the changes in the extracellular concentration of adenosine in the PVN are mediated via adenosine receptors on the noradrenergic neurons that project to the PVN. Moreover, the adenosine receptors are necessary for maintaining normothermia during a brief cold exposure when the noradrenergic neurons are involved in the control of body temperature. 570a42141b
