I get the length of a path using the command, `find -type f -exec file -i {} +` But how to find the length of the file's path? I can use the command: `find -type f -printf "%s\n"` But how can I find out the length of the path? I read that I can use `-d` for directory only, but I don't know what should I use? Can anybody provide some suggestion or method to find these? Thank you A: If the path is a symbolic link (see `man find` for more info), which includes directories in which the link points to, then `find` will not use the link's real path. The linked file is still referred to by its real name so you can get its real length with `file(1)`. If you just want to get the length of the contents of the file rather than the length of the name (which you already know from `file -i`), you can use `du -sh`.
